KENDALL'S CORNER

Securing our Past, Caring for Our Future

When a property is entrusted to The Trustees, it becomes ours – and yours – forever. That means lovingly caring for its well-being and ensuring that our children and our children's children share our joy and our dedication.

That dedication is clear to anyone who has explored one of our historic houses, where visitors walk away with a clear sense of the way The Trustees use the objects and the place itself to tell the story of people and the land. The Old Manse window, inscribed with a description of Una Hawthorne marveling at icicles, speaks of a family that cherished childhood; the kitchen tools at the Ashley House speak to the labors of enslaved African American Elizabeth "Mumbet" Freeman, whose court case to win her freedom led to the end of slavery in Massachusetts.

But what you don't see at our properties are the thousands of photographs, maps, plans, and objects that we don't have room to display – but whose stories are just as compelling and inspiring. We're committed not only to cataloging and conserving all of our precious resources, but to sharing our stories for future generations to discover. It's a commitment that has found its culmination in our state-of-the-art Archives and Research Center.

But it's not just our objects and archives that require such dedication to care and nurturing. Designed and natural landscapes – even those that seem to take care of themselves – present management questions as complex as the most intricate painting restoration. Hedges planted 30 years ago grow so tall that they rob sun-loving blossoms of their needed light. A neighbor's pretty flower becomes a curse of garlic mustard threatening to destroy rare native plants.

These are the day-to-day questions that we can find answers for, and, though it may take years, we are gaining ground working with partners, neighbors, and volunteers to root out invasive species, strengthen our landscapes, tend our gardens, and engage our communities. But there is a larger threat – global climate change – whose impact on our most cherished places we can only speculate about. And that's why we must mobilize more people – now – to speak up for what could be lost.

Every time someone finds pleasure, solace, beauty, and fun through one of our special places, it's an opening, a chance to spark their own sense of urgency and inspire them to get involved. We lead by our beautiful examples. We create change by yours.

Old houses tend to collect a lot of books — particularly old houses inhabited by esteemed writers and artists, and the Old Manse in Concord is no exception: Altogether, some 3,000 volumes were assembled in the house from the time it was built in 1770 until it was acquired by The Trustees in 1939.

"These books date back to the late 17th century, in English, French, and German," explains Tom Beardsley, Historic Site Manager at the Old Manse. "But it's not just the books themselves that are so significant. The drawings and notes made in the margins by their owners are extremely interesting." Since those owners included literary giant Ralph Waldo Emerson, the books represent a priceless historic resource. Appraised and cataloged over the years by experts and knowledgeable volunteers, the collection remains a treasure for members and visitors.

Even with such attention to individual objects, The Trustees, the careful preserver of so many special places across Massachusetts, have spent most of their more than 100 years without a place to properly manage and care for their rich cache of historic materials. These include The Trustees' own records dating back to 1891, as well as the accumulated fine and decorative arts and household goods of its 10 museum houses (five of which are National Historic Landmarks), which range from paintings by American masters and fragile rugs, to fine furniture and even household receipts. Frannie Colburn, chair of the The Trustees' Historic Resources Committee and a guiding force at the organization for more than three decades, says, "We've been storing things in unused basements, barns, attics – and worried for years about it. It just became more and more obvious that we needed a facility to catalog and conserve valuable objects and documents."

Over the last 10 years, Susan Edwards, Trustees Director of Historic Resources, along with Historic Resources staff and committee members, worked to develop such a facility. With the help of generous grants, they surveyed The Trustees' collections across the state and developed long-range conservation plans for objects. A collections software program was purchased, pieces were photographed, and vulnerable objects received professional conservation care. Still, The Trustees lacked the right physical space – a facility with state-of-the-art climate control and work space for researchers.

Then, a few years ago, The Trustees acquired a 15,000-square-foot former museum building in Sharon, allowing them to create the Archives and Research Center, or ARC. Built in 1915 as a tuberculosis sanitarium, the building had most recently housed the Kendall Whaling Museum, making it ideal for The Trustees' purpose. Edwards explains, "It was almost turn-key. It had climate control, low light levels. It was fireproof and secure." Funds provided by The Trustees' 2006 capital campaign turned a decade of dreaming and planning into reality.

The first steps: providing building upgrades and finding the right staff. "What's important with the advent of the ARC is not just the building," emphasizes Bill Clendaniel, Historic Resources Committee Member, whose distinguished career in historic preservation includes 20 years as president of Mount Auburn Cemetery. "It's the staff: trained people getting everybody excited about the history of our properties."

The Trustees found a manager for the ARC in Mark Wilson, who worked as one of the organization's first historic resources managers in the 1990s, then went on to serve as Registrar and Curator of Properties for the Nantucket Historical Association. "It's great to be coming in on a project like the ARC from the start," Wilson says. Archivist Miriam Spectre came to the ARC well prepared to shape a new archives operation after a career that has spanned the Beinecke Rare Book and Manuscript Library at Yale, the University of Pennsylvania Archives Center, Bryn Mawr College, and the American Philosophical Society.

By the spring of 2008, with the staff in place and renovations complete, the first objects were being packed onto trucks and sent to the ARC for cataloging, conservation, and, in some cases, storage. "We're selective in what we're sending away," says Will Garrison, Historic Resources Manager for the Berkshires and Pioneer Valley regions. It's the household objects and furnishings that make The Trustees' house museums feel so alive, as if their previous owners had just gone out for the afternoon. "We don't want to take away from the experience of visitors," stresses Garrison.

But it's those many items that don't get displayed to visitors, that had been tucked into attics and desk drawers – Fletcher Steele's notebooks for the gardens at Naumkeag, Eastman Johnson's portrait of agricultural innovator Daniel Fuller Appleton – that are now making their way to the ARC. They're being managed so that Trustees staff and volunteers can consult them in preserving and interpreting the properties. Spectre explains, "Our objects have been well documented, but some of the archives and books haven't."

Now, those 3,000 books from the Old Manse as well as other items from across the state are gradually being examined by Spectre, as The Trustees determine how best to display and preserve them. "The activity of cataloging this wonderful stuff is a way of taking ownership of what we have," notes Bill Clendaniel. He adds that the history revealed by these objects and records will do more than expand visitors' appreciation of The Trustees' properties: It may well help them appreciate the larger world they live in. "The richness of what is right here in Massachusetts is overwhelming. To a great extent, our history is the history of the nation."

Among the treasures Spectre is uncovering are carefully preserved family papers from the 370-year history of Appleton Farms. "There are stacks of letters tied up with ribbons that hadn't been touched since the turn of the 19th century," she explains. "One of the Appletons was a Union soldier in the Civil War who sent letters home from the field. Other family letters offer a remarkable window into the social and cultural history of the 19th century."

Documents like these are an essential part of The Trustees' mission. "We can tell the story of the land because of the buildings and objects and records," says ARC Manager Wilson. "We're not just fields, but houses, gardens, letters, books, ribbons for prize-winning pigs. It all works together and becomes a more complete story of the history and culture of Massachusetts."

The experience of even a natural landscape like World's End can be enriched by archival material. The Trustees own drawings by pioneering landscape architect Frederick Law Olmsted that outline plans for a residential development at World's End; they offer ample food for thought for anyone who strolls that extraordinary landscape today.

Wilson points out another huge advantage of cataloging all the many papers and photos long stored in boxes and drawers: "When we share with people what we have, often those people will in turn shed light on its significance. For example, a researcher recently brought to our attention a scrapbook put together by Trustees founder Charles Eliot." The scrapbook, which was started in 1889 – two years before Eliot founded The Trustees – was full of newspaper clippings about the wider movement to protect open land, properties that might need protection, and, later, the new organization itself. "Eliot was making contact with different groups, and they were contacting him," says Wilson. "He was excited and committed to making this work. From the scrapbook, you get a real sense that it wasn't about him but about the land and working together." Eliot even saved the first mailing he ever sent out about The Trustees – and the membership form he included with it. "And this scrapbook had been sitting tucked away without our knowing it," Wilson marvels.

But, he emphasizes, preservation and storage are not the ultimate goals of the ARC – sharing this rich historical material is. "We don't want the ARC to be a mausoleum. We want things to be used." As the ARC gets under full sail – a process of gradual acceleration over the next 12 years – it will provide an extraordinary resource for scholars and educators with an interest in everything from Colonial dairy practices to the China Trade to the origins of the land trust movement. Eventually, there will be a searchable database of the collections, and, ultimately, a website that will make documents available to the public online.

The ARC represents a new level of stewardship for the organization and the opportunity to advance scholarship of Massachusetts history and culture. It also embodies The Trustees' determination to preserve its historic resources with the same care as its natural ones. Thus a human dimension will enhance every meadow, field, forest, and wetland the organization protects, as the decisions made by generations of past owners are illuminated by the records they left behind. "What we're doing at the ARC helps to connect the past, present, and future," says Spectre. "We have to know what came before us to shape tomorrow well."

Michele Owens is a Saratoga Springs, NY-based writer whose work has appeared in numerous magazines, including the winter 2008 issue of Special Places. She is also a regular contributor to www.gardenrant.com.

The Ecologist's NIGHTMARE

Fighting the good fight against rogue plants, tree-eating beetles, and climate change. by Michael O'Connor

FOR THIS COBBLE-KEEPER, IT'S PERSONAL. THE VERY IDEA of invasive species attacking the health and ecological integrity of his beloved Bartholomew's Cobble keeps Rene Wendell up at night, plotting short-term counter-measures and planning long-term strategies.

"I do take it personally," the Bartholomew's Cobble Conservation Ranger says defiantly. "The Trustees' 'Find Your Place' can sound like buzzwords, but it's not hype. I found my place, and it's here. And because the Cobble is so special, the idea that this could be lost means an overwhelming sense of responsibility."

Wendell is referring to the Sheffield property's status as a National Natural Landmark, which it received in 1971. These 329 acres along the Housatonic River in Massachusetts' southwest corner are named for the two rugged knolls, called cobbles, which rise like a wild and mysterious centerpiece above the river. Yet Bartholomew's Cobble also features a half dozen different forest habitats (remarkable for a property of its size) and more than 800 different plants, including almost 50 species of ferns nestled within the reservation's shady recesses.

But invasive species such as garlic mustard, introduced from Europe by colonists as a food source, threaten to overwhelm the Cobble. Unlike many other plants, garlic mustard can grow in sun and shade, moist and dry conditions – and it even poisons surrounding soil to ward off competitors. Add to the list that it has no natural predators and you have what Wendell considers the biggest threat to biodiversity at the Cobble. "Garlic mustard's capacity for exponential growth is amazing and impressive," he says. "We don't want to see it climb the cobble and get to the ferns."

Wendell, the son of a hunter and trapper, grew up in the outdoors. His childhood experiences shaped his view that seemingly small changes can have massive repercussions for the natural world.

And in fighting garlic mustard and other invasives, he has adopted The Trustees' "We Can't Do It Alone" rallying cry: Wendell's eradication program is largely the work of volunteers.

CLOCKWISE: The Bottass Farm is a beautiful – and important – neighbor of Bartholomew’s Cobble. From his office in the Doyle Conservation Center, Ecology Program Manager Russ Hopping helps coordinate land management efforts, including a controlled burn project at Weir Hill in North Andover.

“We’ve been fighting invasive species here for six years,” he says. “We can never have enough volunteers, because this fight will never be over.”

His view is tied to the realization that even if The Trustees make great strides in protecting our landscapes from invaders, nature is no respecter of man-made boundaries.

“Because all my neighbors have these same problems – but don’t always have the resources or resolve to solve them – when I look in the future I can see the Cobble probably being an ecological island of biodiversity,” Wendell says.

Someone like John Bottass, who farms 77 acres just south of the Cobble and hays the reservation’s fields, is a good neighbor to have, however. When Wendell and Bottass found themselves at odds over when to cut hay so as to both protect grassland-nesting bobolinks and harvest the hay when ripe, they worked together to reach a compromise that would meet both their needs. That solution may have convinced the farmer to protect his property with a conservation restriction – and to ask The Trustees to help.

“I developed good relations with the Cobble and now I want to preserve this land,” the 70-year-old Bottass says. “I don’t want to see houses, holes in the ground. I appreciate the land; The Trustees appreciate the land. And that’s the way I feel about it.”

Director of Stewardship and Planning Lisa Vernegaard echoes that view, and hopes to see many more John Bottasses working to care for land. “Our hope is that our visitors, our members, and our neighbors will join us in fighting these battles, not just on our properties, but on their own land as well,” Vernegaard says.

But saving one special place is just the start. The Trustees are thinking big because we have to. “We have to get to the broader landscape level,” Wendell says.

And not just for combating invasive species. Like many Trustees reservations, Bartholomew’s Cobble is home to a colony of hemlock trees, which are threatened in Massachusetts by the hemlock woolly adelgid (uh-DEL-jid), a tiny insect that literally sucks the sap from the magnificent conifer, ultimately killing it. And since an infestation was discovered in Worcester last year, Trustees ecologists, staff, and volunteers have joined the fight against the Asian longhorned beetle (pictured left), serving as an early detection team against the spread of the beetle, which bores into hardwoods (maples are especially vulnerable) destroying them.

Ecology Program Manager Russ Hopping says thinking broadly is critical. “It’s not just about one property or one watershed,” Hopping says. “We have hemlocks from Bartholomew’s Cobble to Pine and Hemlock Knoll [in Wenham].” In his office at the Doyle Conservation Center in Leominster hang two posters that reflect the key values of statewide land and water habitats. “It’s a constant reminder to always be thinking of the big picture,” he says.

At this larger level, partnerships can determine success or failure. Working with volunteers and community groups, ecologist Julie Richburg makes use of a series of posters to alert citizens of the Highland communities to be on the lookout for the “Least Wanted”: individual invasive species that threaten key habitats.

Trustees partnerships are also showing success in species restoration. At the Lyman Reserve in Wareham, MassWildlife scientists have inserted tiny transponders in rare, sea-run brook trout to track their movements along Red Brook, which The Trustees are helping to restore. At Weir Hill in North Andover, The Trustees have worked with the local fire department and the

Alliaria petiolata

Unwanted for: Infesting forested & open areas, displacing native plants, poisoning butterflies, reducing wildlife habitat

Plant Type: Biennial herb with a garlic odor, Basal rosettes occur 1st yr, plant flowers the 2nd yr, Native to Europe

What you can do:

- Hand pull early in the spring and remove
- Mow or cut several times through growing season to prevent flowering & seed production (seeds may survive for up to 5 yrs in the soil before sprouting)
- Prevent spread by not moving infested soil or fill

Massachusetts Natural Heritage and Endangered Species Program in using controlled burns, or “prescribed fire,” to help restore habitat for certain rare butterflies, birds, and plants.

“These are huge challenges, but we’re beginning to celebrate some victories,” notes Vernegaard. “We’ve seen the power of volunteers and other partners coming together to tackle these problems.”

The ultimate threat to ecological health, though, may be climate change. Hopping suggests Massachusetts is facing a new invasives phenomenon: that of southern species migrating to New England as the earth grows warmer.

“We’ve already seen it in birds, from cardinals and tufted titmice to turkey vultures. They may be the advance guard, so to speak,” he warns. “As for plants and insects, we really don’t know yet what’s on the way in – or the way out. We may be in the midst of a big turnover already.”

To prepare, Trustees ecologists are working to reduce current stresses on species and habitats. “It can be as simple as having a stream without dams,” Hopping says. “We want to make our ecosystems more resilient to climate change to assist the plants and animals on our properties to survive and/or adapt to the changes that are underway.”

For Bartholomew’s Cobble, such efforts are welcomed. Hemlocks, already stressed by the woolly adelgid, will suffer further under rising temperatures. And – wouldn’t you know it – the hemlock-killing adelgid hates the cold and loves the heat.

“We’ve already lost some beautiful hemlocks,” Cobble-keeper Rene Wendell laments. So, it could be a while before he starts getting a full night’s sleep.

A Gardener's G

The Long Hill gardens are a labor of hope, imagination, and love.

Betty Stone

SOME GARDENS FLAUNT THEIR knowledge of geometry. Some wish you to know how much effort was involved. Some take a lot of starch. And then there are the gardens at Long Hill – rolling down from the house and blurring gently into the surrounding woodlands, relaxed and gracious as a linen suit on a summer day.

For 65 years, Long Hill was the retreat of Ellery Sedgwick, longtime editor of The Atlantic Monthly. In 1916, his first wife, Mabel Cabot Sedgwick, author of The Garden Month by Month, a noted guide to garden plants, began the gardens. After Mabel's death, Ellery's second wife, Marjorie Russell, took up the trowel – in the same spirit of serious horticulture and unfussy garden design.

Today, the Long Hill Garden Committee and Superintendent Dan Bouchard are four years into a multi-year plan to bring the gardens back in tune with the Sedgwicks' guiding vision – rooting out invasive species, reworking vistas, and gradually reinvesting the five acres of garden rooms with new horticultural interest.

We caught up recently with Long Hill Garden Committee Chair, Betty Stone, to get an update.

Through each phase of the renovation, what decisions must be made, and what is the process behind those decisions?

We've divided the project into five phases. At each stage, Dan [Bouchard, Long Hill Superintendent] and I look at the next segments we'll be working on. We consult the Sedgwicks' gardening journals. We look at what is overgrown and what has "shaded out" other plants over the years. Then we work with committee members to decide what to remove and what to order and when.

How closely has the garden committee followed the vision laid out by Mabel Sedgwick and Marjorie Russell Sedgwick in their gardening journals?

We've tried not to deviate or change at all, really. We've always been determined to retain the aesthetics and spirit of the Sedgwick women. But a garden is a work in time, it grows and changes.

You know, both the Sedgwick women considered Long Hill to be an experimental garden, not locked into a particular period. That has given us courage and confidence through this project. We don't always agree – with them or with one another – but we always find a way. Reminding ourselves to ask "What would Marjorie think?" helps.

What do the Sedgwicks' gardening journals tell you about the gardeners themselves?

On first reading, the journals seem quite dry. But then you come across little comments in the margins: "This didn't work out." Or "Dead!" You learn that Marjorie was actually quite frugal in her work. For example, she would often buy a single plant and then propagate it. But then you read that she purchased a hundred Galax wildflowers. She must have really loved those.

In recent decades, gardens and designed spaces seem to have become more popular than ever. Why do you think that is?

Well, I've loved gardens so much since I was a child and was so involved in them that I never saw gardening as a fad. But I have seen interest grow, and today's conversations about climate change, ecosystems, and interest in local food have all been a help.

G. KATES

You and the committee are credited with kick-starting the renovation, but also for staying actively involved through what might be a decade-long project. What has made you stick with it?

We've been entrusted with important decisions. We've been able to build trust with the organization, and that's been very important to us. It's not just about pulling weeds. It's about mutual trust. It's empowered us, really. Actually, much of what I've learned about gardens and gardening has been through working with this committee and The Trustees.

The Trustees are planning a Horticultural Center here at Long Hill. Can you tell us more about it?

I'm very excited about it. Education has been key to getting more people involved in the gardens here, and it's really what Mabel and Marjorie Sedgwick might have wanted. They loved the idea of visitors, and the concept of "taking something away." They often gave away plants to their friends, and we hope to continue this tradition of having visitors take something away: knowledge; a tip or suggestion for their own garden; and plants, if possible. I see a lot of Mabel and Marjorie's spirit in this center.

Long Hill Superintendent Dan Bouchard (ABOVE) and the Garden Committee rely on volunteers. "We need more!" says Betty Stone. "From hands-on maintenance to events at the new Horticulture Center."

Journal notes left by Mabel Sedgwick and, later, Marjorie Russell Sedgwick have guided the Garden Committee in their renovation work.
